year's legislative session, Public Chapter 338 requires that TWRA "develop a plan to study [paddlefish] sustainability, population conditions, and juvenile survival rates on waters not currently open to commercial roe fishing."

Composed of commercial fishermen, the committee met after the bill's passage and recently recommended to the 13-member Tennessee Wildlife Resources Commission that the studies begin in early 2012.

The advisory committee wants TWRA to study Cordell Hull and Old Hickory reservoirs in Middle Tennessee, and Norris, Melton Hill, and Watts Barr reservoirs in East Tennessee.

A portion of Old Hickory is already open to paddlefish nets, but the advisory committee has asked that the study include an approximately 50-mile stretch of water from where Highway 231 crosses the reservoir upstream to Cordell Hull Dam. That stretch has been closed to commercial netting.

The TWRC will next meet on Oct. 13 at TWRA's Region II Ray Bell Building located inside the Ellington Agricultural Center. There are several other advisory board recommendations that the commission will discuss, including one that would remove a size limit restriction on catfish.

While paddlefish are not listed in Tennessee on any endangered or threatened list, there is concern among fish biologists on a national level that this particular fish is in decline and there are tight restrictions on the international sale of its roe that is used for caviar.

ation and possession of drug paraphernalia.

According to affidavits filed by Trooper Robert Woody, THP; Mr. Allen was in a white 1999 Cadillac that was broken down at the 368 mile marker in Loudon County. Trooper Woody asked him to identify himself and he stated he did not have his identification, but his name was Bernard Williams and his date of birth was August 38, 1987.

Trooper Woody then told the man there were not 38 days in August and he wanted his real name.

While searching the vehicle from a positive K-9 alert from THP

K-9 Jessie, the trooper located some rolling papers in a pair of the man's pants. He also located a small amount of marijuana, but was unable to recover it due to how small it was.

A New York benefit card was discovered in the vehicle with the man's actual identity. It was later learned he was wanted out of New York and authorities there would extradite him.
