Combating the Growing Money Laundering Threat

Specialized FBI Unit Focuses on Disrupting Professional Money Launderers

Every year, more than $300 billion in concealed transactions is moved around the United States, according to a U.S. Department of the Treasury report on money laundering and terrorist financing threats.

Transnational criminal organizations, foreign intelligence services, and terrorist groups—as well as Internet fraudsters and other criminals—move billions of dollars each year through the international banking system and across borders to conceal the origin of the funds. To more effectively address the threat, the FBI has placed a by coming face-to-face with God's own word made flesh, Christ Jesus, through the means of grace. Surely, we long to know about God, but only because we have come to know him in his grace, mercy, love and presence. And strangely, even as in Christ we know our God, in Christ we know ourselves as we all shall be.

renewed emphasis on investigations that target the middlemen who facilitate the hidden flow of cash.

"Our focus is on third-party facilitators," said James Barnacle, who heads the FBI's Money Laundering Unit. "They include, among others, lawyers, accountants, and brokers with the ability to facilitate the process of moving money for dangerous criminal organizations. That's who our targets are."

The facilitators use traditional and non-traditional means to launder staggering amounts of illicit proceeds every year. Barnacle said business e-mail compromise, or BEC, scams and the use of virtual currencies are on the rise

To help combat this growing threat, the FBI has been adding resources to its Money Laundering Unit in the Criminal Investigative Division. The team has been intensifying its efforts to support existing investigations and to identify and investigate previously unknown facilitators. It works alongside other Bureau divisions, including Counterintelligence and Cyber, to analyze criminal networks and to disrupt their operations. The team also provides guidance and training and works with domestic and foreign law enforcement partners to develop initiatives that support investigations in the FBI's 56 field offices.

Innovations in technology have made it easier for launderers to communicate anonymously and move money, making it more challenging to identify, investigate, and prosecute launderers, who shield a staggering amount of money in their varied illegal transactions. These types of crimes often come to light through tips from within the private sector or the general public.

"One of the tools we use to combat money laundering is the Crime Complaint Center website, or IC3.gov," said Barnacle. "We encourage victims of fraud to submit a report on the IC3.gov site as soon as possible. It's a tremendous asset for our team."

One of the Money Laundering Unit's most critical partnerships is with the private sector, where financial institutions face significant risks and are required to have robust anti-money laundering policies and procedures.

"The relationship we have with private industry is just as important as the partnerships we have with other government agencies and regulators," said Barnacle. "Our mission would not succeed without our partnership with the private sector."

What is Money Laundering?

Money laundering is the process by which criminals conceal or disguise their proceeds and make them appear to have come from legitimate sources.

Money laundering allows criminals to hide and accumulate wealth, avoid prosecution, evade taxes, increase profits through reinvestment, and fund further criminal activity.

While many definitions for money laundering exist, it can be defined very simply as turning "dirty" money into "clean" money. And it's a significant crime—money laundering can undermine the integrity and stability of FBI that they've returned home from the 2016 Summer Olympic Games in Rio de Janeiro. The FBI intends to make that process easier through a hiring initiative that introduces athletes to job opportunities at the Bureau.

More than 70 Team USA members visited FBI Headquarters in Washington, D.C., Saturday to learn how their athletic and educational experiences could be applied to positions at the FBI. Special agents, intelligence analysts, and human resources specialists were all on hand to share the variety of options currently open to prospective candidates.

The October 1 visit began with opening remarks from Associate Deputy Director David Bowdich, who highlighted the FBI's mission and core values and stressed the importance of maintaining a diverse workforce.

"We need to do everything we can in our power to mirror our country, and we're taking great strides to diversify to the best of our ability," said Bowdich. "It will make us more effective as an organization."

While Saturday morning's visit was the first time the FBI has welcomed such a large group of Olympians and Paralympians to its Headquarters, recruiting dedicated athletes to join the workforce is nothing new for the Bureau. Special Agent Jason Read, for example, continues to train with and compete on the U.S. men's rowing team when he isn't supporting investigations out of the FBI's New York Field Office. In addition to winning several medals in rowing races around the globe, Read counts a gold medal from the 2004 Athens Summer Olympics among his accomplishments.

"The athletic passion on display at the games in Rio can be directly applied to the shared commitment of working for the FBI and keeping our country safe."

Read shared his path from Olympian to special agent and described how he was able to translate his learned dedication and teamwork mantra to being a member of the FBI.

"It was an honor to honor host fellow Olympians at FBI Headquarters as they begin to research and consider new careers," Read said. "The athletic passion on display at the games in Rio can be directly applied to the shared commitment of working for the FBI and keeping our country safe."

cruciating event represented a cross-section of Olympic teams, including synchronized swimming, shooting, diving, soccer, and rowing. U.S. women's national field hockey team member Kathleen Sharkey joined fellow teammates in touring Headquarters and taking part in the recruiting information session.

"It was interesting to hear about the FBI culture and all the job opportunities there were," Sharkey said. "Coming from a team sport myself, I would thrive and enjoy working in this type of environment."

Like many of her fellow Olympians, Sharkey is now back at home considering what her next steps are going to be now that the Summer Games are over. As the FBI continues to partner with organizations like the U.S. Olympic Committee on its recruiting initiatives, dedicated athletes across the country can find a new home working alongside a motivated team of public servants.
