FBI

Saxonburg, Pennsylvania during a routine traffic stop, would now be 85 years old. A $100,000 reward is being offered for information leading to the fugitive's whereabouts—or the location of his remains.

"These photographs present Donald Webb in a completely new way," said Special Agent Thomas MacDonald, who is investigating the case from the FBI's Boston Division. "The face of this investigation for decades was grainy black and white photos," he said. The new color photographs, taken a year prior to the murder, show Webb from multiple angles in much greater detail. "If he has been living under an alias all these years," MacDonald said, "these photographs might generate the tip that helps us resolve the case."

One of the longest tenured fugitives to appear on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted Fugitives list, Webb was a career criminal who specialized in jewel theft and operated in the Providence, Rhode Island and Southeastern Massachusetts areas. It is believed he was in Pennsylvania planning a robbery at the time of the murder.

The white Mercury Cougar getaway vehicle Webb was driving at the time of the murder was located several weeks later in Rhode Island, and blood evidence linked to Webb was recovered from the vehicle, leading investigators to believe that he was wounded during the confrontation.

"There have been few leads on the Webb case for a long time," MacDonald said. But the FBI's Boston Division started an active cold case investigation in 2015. As part of that investigation, the new photos were obtained. "We've been doing a lot of interviews and knocking on a lot of doors," MacDonald explained.

At the time of the murder, Webb lived in New Bedford, Massachusetts with his wife and stepson. He was known to associate with members of the Patriarca crime family in Rhode Island and with criminals in southern Florida. He was also known to frequent motels in eastern Pennsylvania under the name Stanley Portas. Portas was the deceased husband of Webb's wife.

MacDonald emphasized that the $100,000 reward could be paid to someone who helps locate Webb's remains if he is deceased. "We want to know one way or the other," he said. "There may be someone out there who had knowledge of his death and is now willing to come forward." It is also possible that Webb is still alive, living under an alias, and that individuals will recognize him from the newly published photographs.

"It might be that someone out there doesn't know that the person they got to know in the 1990s and early 2000s was Donald Webb, and that could help us resolve this case," MacDonald said.

During the investigation, MacDonald has talked to numerous retired agents and police detectives who have worked on the Webb case over the years, and he traveled to Saxonburg and met with police officers there.

"The case still haunts these people," he said, noting that Adams was 31 years old at the time of his death and left behind a wife and two young children. "Resolving this case would be a great victory for law enforcement and for

from prison, he will be supervised by the U.S. Probation Office for three years. Doggart was also found guilty of soliciting another person to commit arson.

Evidence presented at trial established that, in February 2015, the FBI learned through a confidential source that Doggart was recruiting people online to carry out an armed attack on Islamberg, a community that is home to a large Muslim population. Doggart arranged to meet with the confidential source in Nashville, where he discussed details of his plan to burn down a mosque, a school, and a cafeteria in Islamberg. He showed the confidential source maps of Islamberg, laid out the number of guns and types of ammunition they would need to destroy the community, and discussed different ways to burn down a mosque and other buildings. Through a court order, the FBI also began intercepting Doggart's phone calls, during which he solicited and recruited people to join him in his attack on Islamberg.

Doggart specifically targeted the mosque because it was a religious building and he discussed burning it down or blowing it up with a Molotov cocktail or other explosive device. At trial, the jury heard recorded conversations in which Doggart repeatedly discussed killing people, including one in which Doggart said, "I don't want to have to kill children, but there's always collateral damage."

"People of all faiths have the fundamental right to worship freely, and this administration will not tolerate attempts to violate that right," said Attorney General Jeff Sessions. "The defendant solicited people to commit acts of violence in an effort to terrorize a community simply because of its Islamic faith. The Justice Department will continue to aggressively investigate and prosecute attacks against our faith-based communities."

"The people of the Eastern District of Tennessee will not tolerate the type of threats and actions perpetrated by Doggart. The United States Attorney's Office will aggressively prosecute those who seek to disrupt the safety of our community and others," said U.S. Attorney Nancy Stallard Harr.

Special Agent in Charge Renae McDermott of the Knoxville Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation states that, "We are committed to investigating violations of federal civil rights statutes. We prioritize civil rights investigations which are designed to protect all persons."

The case was investigated by the FBI, Knoxville Division. Trial Attorney Saeed A. Mody of the Civil Rights Division, Assistant U.S. Attorney Perry H. Piper of the Eastern District of Tennessee, and Trial Attorney Clement McGovern of the National Security Division's Counterterrorism Section, represented the United States at trial.
